

Editorial

With this issue, Cognitio: Revista de Filosofia completes nine years of existence. These have been years of intense dedication to keep alive a vehicle capable of disseminating specific knowledge in the field of epistemology, dialoguing with other philosophical specificities, with particular focus on pragmatism. This was only possible through the joint efforts of an entire team, striving indefatigably and in concert to ensure the functionality and high quality that has earned it growing prestige both at home and abroad. Notwithstanding having a team of professionals fully capable of handling the publication of this journal, we must acknowledge that it is that part of the team comprising professors from the Center for Pragmatism Studies that provides the necessary vital substance and enthusiasm for the continuance of this project. The definitive consolidation of Cognitio in our midst, however, does not prevent us from prizing each issue published as an important achievement in our area. I wish, thus, to congratulate everyone for yet another issue concluded.

The well-balanced spectrum of subjects published in the various issues of Cognitio has been greatly appreciated and praised by the majority of our more assiduous readers. And, as usual, this issue contains a balanced range of various texts on pragmatism, as well as pertinent themes on contemporary epistemology and a short text of mine on abstract logic.

For these reasons, with each new issue, we feel stimulated to strive even more to offer our community a quality journal that can contribute toward the dissemination of ideas for the philosophy of our time, always associated with its main sources and roots.
